Legal Corner - By Bill D. Preston, Q.C

Limitation of Liability Clauses; Ain't Judge Proof

Judges clearly require that, if you want to be shielded by a Limitation Clause, you'd better be sure that the person/party claiming against you has knowingly signed on. A couple of Alberta cases bring these requirements home.

In the recent case of Swift v. Eleven Eleven Architecture, the Alberta Court of Appeal dealt with the issue of requiring a signature. The facts of the project were that the structural subconsultant had seriously and dangerously messed up and at trial sought to hide behind the following limitation of damages clause in the Architect/Client Agreement:

The Client agrees that any and all claims which the Client has or hereafter may have against the Designer which arise solely and directly out of the Designer's duties and responsibilities in contract or in tort, shall be limited to $500,000.00. Click Here to Read More
